

Branded Customer Community

How can Europe's leading retailers simultaneously engage with their customers, improve customer advocacy and reduce service costs?

Engaging with customers online in order to build customer loyalty and foster trust is a high priority for all retailers who want to compete in a highly competitive marketplace. Today's online shoppers are more socially active than ever, with a keen interest in participating in conversations that allow them to engage with your company, get their questions answered, share their opinions and voice their concerns.

Facebook and Twitter

Most of the world's biggest retailers are active on social media sites such as Twitter and Facebook, allowing customers to contact them directly. These off-site communities are powerful as they give customers a platform to express their opinions. But just 2% of fans return to brand pages they like on Facebook and posts on these social sites have short shelf lives, so they do nothing to reduce one-off common requests like FAQs and other simple-to-solve issues. They are also not optimized to connect your customers to one another and you have to operate within the terms and conditions of each site and communicate within their design and functional parameters (which can change without notice).

Benefits of Branded Communities

The next step for retailers is having an online community built directly into their site, engaging shoppers and boosting sales with peer-to-peer support, product Q&A's and co-creation. By integrating social and community features, your corporate website becomes a customer engagement hub - hosting social conversations that relate closely to your brand and products. In this context your presence on social networks becomes secondary. They provide outreach for customers but are in reality integrated extensions of your branded community in terms of how they operate and seek to build membership.

Customers are three times more likely to visit your website than to engage with your company on external channels such as Facebook.

FORRESTER

While you might want to leave your Facebook fans on Facebook, the smart move is to divert them to your own communities whenever possible.

Drive Business Value with a Community

Building online customer communities is about creating connections between the people within your organization to the people that buy your products and services.

More importantly, they provide a social space where your customers can share their opinions, ideas and knowledge and where your company can provide access to relevant, trusted information at every stage in the customer buying cycle around the topics your customers care about.

By launching an online customer community and integrating this into natural engagement points on their website like product and support pages and search results, retailers are successfully deploying a winning customer engagement strategy. This approach boosts feedback, conversions, trust, customer satisfaction and return visits, while at the same time reducing abandonment rates and service costs.

TomTom, for example, has successfully created a community within its website, which receives 4 million annual visits and functions as an online knowledge base where customers can get self-service help. As one correct answer in the community helps on average 30 other people with a similar problem, this has resulted in a call deflection of over 25 percent and a constant stream of valuable product feedback from their customers. In one month TomTom resolved 21,000 cases, resulting in €150,000 savings.

‘Organizations integrating communities into customer support will realize cost reductions ranging from 10 to 50 percent.’
